Stock photos have stripped Martins of work as a photographer and head of Brazil's Câmera Clara Photography Studio; but there is a ubiquitous person, in particular, who has in mind, and belongs to Jesper Bruun, the world's most downloaded man. A five-minute short, created by the Brazilian agency Filatelphia, chronicles Martins' mission to come face-to-face with the model, travelling from his home in Belo Horizonte, Brazil to bruun's hometown of Denmark. dotted with random rapid-fire questions, past life, and daily moments-turned-ad-snapshots with Bruun shows that the world's most downloaded man simply can't help the fact that, in his hands (or his face), even the most mundane activities like shaving or spraying on deodorant end up looking like picture-perfect stock photos. It seemed as if Martins was finally coming to understand and appreciate the man who, just doing his job, was in turn reducing Martins's work at Câmera Clara-ie until a shocking revelation stands to unravel the budding bromance. With their earthy cafes and bright skin tones, the athletic paintings of the artist Thomas Eakins in the late 19th century took advantage of the robust, expansive energy of the new United States. Painted around his native Philadelphia, these images of thoughtful rowers, boxers, and euphoric swimmers have rarely featured on the West Coast. The Los Angeles County Museum of Art owned one of Eakins' great wrestling paintings. to celebrate, he has assembled his sports oils-including 1871 pastoral The Champion Single (left)-as well as the master's watercolor, sketches, and the first experiments photographing the human form.
